The purpose with this video/article series is to connect the strings between the Antediluvian Aryans/Namlu'u, the Inner Earth with its Intra-terrestrials, the secret societies, from which Hitler got the idea of the Superhuman Aryan race, and then we'll end with where we are in present time. How does Nazi Germany's ideology fit into the world scene today?

Before we continue where we left off from Part 3, let us do some debunking. Then we'll go into some roots to the Nazi ideology, and the expeditions of Rear Admiral Richard E. Byrd.

When I first started looking into these subjects about fifteen years ago, there was a decent amount of information out there about Nazism being linked to the occult. Not so anymore. This subject has been heavily vetted out and censored. There is a reason for this—something we will go into when we get to present time in an upcoming part of this series.

There are still some alternative sources having dug quite deeply into this, but agent provocateurs have entered the stage and tried their best to debunk almost everything that has to do with Nazism and the occult.

Wikipedia is no exception. There it says the entire subject is a conspiracy theory, and there is no evidence that the upper echelon of the Nazi party was into the occult. They list a lot of sources and books by people who have done a great amount of research into this, but then go on saying that they are all insubstantial, without bringing any convincing evidence to that effect. Ironically, Wikipedia and other conspirators do acknowledge that Heinrich Himmler was deeply involved in the occult (because they can't deny that—too much proof). However, they then claim he was the only one who was interested in the occult among the leadership of the Nazi party, without mentioning how they came to that conclusion. They even try to debunk that the Vrili Society and the Thule Society had anything to do with Hitler. This is interesting for two reasons: 1) Thule had the Nazi swastika as its logo already back in 1919—long before Hitler came to power, and 2) mainstream sources admit that Hitler's mentor, Dietrich Eckart, was a high-ranking member of Thule, and that he actually did say, "Follow Hitler! He will dance, but it is I who have called the tune!" Also, mainstream sources are now trying to debunk the excellent and eye-opening TV documentary called "Hitler and the Occult"<sup>1</sup> from 2007, even though there are authentic pictures of German Nazi parades, where soldiers are dressed in armor with Knights Templar crosses on their chests, and a lot of occult symbols occurring in public in Germany at the time, put out there by the Nazis.

So, the mainstream sources apparently now try to get across that Hitler's "Final Solution" was just something that was invented within a few deranged minds and was then planned out by Hitler himself. That is a very dangerous approach. On one hand we are told that it's dangerous and evil to think that the gas chambers and concentration camps did not exist (which they did), but when mainstream sources try to debunk the occult roots of Nazism, that's almost as dangerous, because they deny the essence of the evil behind Nazi Germany, and we cannot learn from our mistakes and our history. Therefore, we are bound to repeat the same mistakes again. This is exactly what is happening now, and it has been more obvious the last couple of years than ever before.

The plain truth of the matter is that there is overwhelming evidence that the Nazi party itself was an occult society. They drew their ideas from the same ancient texts that I have referred to in my research—they were obsessed with Atlantis, the Hollow Earth, the Aryan/Namlu'u "superior" race, and the root races in general. Nazism also drew their ideas from Blavatsky's Theosophy about the Superhumans from below the surface of the planet, and from other dimensions (Ascended Masters and Inner Earth superior beings, such as the gods mentioned in the Emerald Tablets of Thoth, Nordic and Icelandic mythology, Hyperborea, and entrances to the world below in Tibet and possibly in Antarctica). As an offspring of Theosophy, the Order of the Golden Dawn was created—another secret society the Nazis were studying. I personally think Blavatsky was genuine and believed in what she experienced, although her connections clearly came from within the Matrix. But like with everything, information can be used for good or for evil, or somewhere in between. We know how the Nazis used it.

The Nazis were also into the Knights Templar, as mentioned earlier, and although I don't have any resources yet as of why they were so much into them, it's still possible to connect some dots. In the Wes Penre Papers (WPP), I discussed the Knights Templar in some detail. I wrote that they were essentially protecting the Mother Goddess "Religion," but later got corrupted by wealth and power and were also infiltrated. Because the Templar were connected to the Goddess, they were also connected to the Aryans, which made the Templar interesting to the Nazi party. Thus, the probable reason for the Knights Templar parades in the streets of Berlin just before and during World War II.

It is evident that the Nazis were interested in Antarctica. Some say it was for strategic reasons, others say it was to have an expedition there to extract oil from whales because Germans ate a lot of margarine, and margarine contains oil (the latter comes from mainstream sources, mind you. It doesn't sound very likely to me). Alternative researchers, however, believe that the Nazis found an entrance to the Inner Earth and encountered a superior race living underground. What everybody, mainstream or not, agree with is that the Nazis did send an expedition to Antarctica in 1938-39 and colonized a part of it, naming it Neuschwabenland, or New Swabia in English. Many mainstream sources tell us that this was just a temporary expedition, and the Germans left the region after just a few years and didn't return until many decades later, in the early 1980s.

Alternative sources, however, tell a different story that the Nazis established a permanent base there, where they, among other things, could develop technologically advanced weapons, including so-called "foo fighters" and flying saucers, of which there are existing blueprints still available, although mainstream sources seem to ignore this.

In previous parts of this series, I said I am going to research Admiral Byrd and his Operation Highjump, when he in 1946 went to Antarctica with 4,000 troops to "explore" the territory. An awarded one-hour documentary from their expedition is available on YouTube if you type in Operation Highjump. There, it shows Byrd's expedition flying in helicopters over the ice and suddenly come upon a large area where there is no ice—the ground is bare. They explain that by saying it has to do with the ground being heated up from beneath. Of course, it doesn't show any combat between an alleged Nazi refuge group that alternative researchers claim was stationed there, but whether or not it existed, it would not be shown in a documentary like that. It's interesting, however, because 250,000 Nazi party members "disappeared" at the end of WW II, and no one seems to know up to this day where they went. Well, we know some of them were smuggled to the U.S. through Operation Paperclip and similar projects, and some fled to Argentina, but that only counts for a few of them. Where did the rest go?

Now, the question is: why did Admiral Byrd bring 4,000 highly armed and equipped troops to Antarctica if they were only there to explore? After all, the war was officially over in 1945. Who or what did they expect to meet in Antarctica? Highly technologically equipped Nazi refugees, who had very advanced weapons?

If there really was a battle between the U.S. and allied forces, such as the Brits, who also were on the Antarctic expedition on one side, and Nazi flying saucers being used to defeat the allies on the other side, it would have been very embarrassing—especially for the Americans—to lose such a battle against an already supposedly defeated country, and it would not have been discussed in mainstream media or by Admiral Byrd himself.

I haven't exhausted my research yet into the potential battles between the allies and the postwar Nazi Germans in Antarctica and the involvement of flying saucers, but I have yet to find any conclusive evidence that they did take place, although there are hints here and there that it did. I would like to come back to this at a later time.

More on Admiral Byrd: we know that he did write at least one diary that then mysteriously "disappeared," just to be discovered seventy years later, in 1996. At least some of the diary has been recovered and is now in the possession of the Ohio State University<sup>2</sup>. This diary was written on an expedition to the Arctic (the North pole) in 1926, when Byrd attempted to be the first in the world to fly over that region. He had great competition from the Norwegian explorer, Roald Amundsen, who was trying to accomplish the same thing at the same time. According to Chief archivist, Raimund Goerler of the Ohio State University, the diary allegedly says that Byrd was about 20 miles from the North Pole when his engine started malfunctioning. He was supposed to drop a lot of American flags from the plane to prove that he was there before Amundsen, but he never dropped the flags for some strange reason, but instead turned around because of his malfunctioning engine. Amundsen then reached the North pole shortly after, but some historians claim that the Norwegian was first, and Byrd never got to the North pole.

If something unusual happened on the 1926 Byrd expedition, it was supposedly not mentioned in the diary that the University has in its possession. The information was either not there, or it was never revealed to the public. There was supposedly no mentioning that he found an entrance to the Inner Earth or met with intra-terrestrial beings. There are books written about Byrd's encounter with this humanoid race, supposedly quoting from a secret diary, but it's impossible to say if they are authentic or not. With that said, there may be more information to gather on this subject, but right now, I have not found evidence enough to verify Byrd's intra-terrestrial connection.

Coming up: Hitler's alleged connection with an interdimensional "super race" and the Vril Society. Was Nazi Germany given advanced technology by an intra-terrestrial or alternatively, an extraterrestrial race?
