Is true imagination something of the past? Are people as creative and imaginative as they used to be? Let us make a comparison between imagination before the Internet with how it is today when Internet has been around for a while.

How important is imagination?

I would say it's crucial because that's what we, as creative souls and minds, use when we create in Sophia's Universe. The expression, "You're just imagining things," meant in a derogatory manner, is very damaging. Of course, when imagination is used to the extreme, a person can be delusional and imagine things without having any control over their imagination, or picking up other's imagination unwittingly, thinking they are theirs, but for the average human, the more imagination we use, the better. And the more it falls outside the norm of other people's "reality," the better, because then something new is being created or added.

There are, of course, constructive, and destructive imagination, depending on the person who is imagining, but even the terms constructive and destructive are arbitrary--where do we draw the line? When it hurts others? Yes, in general. I think the listener or reader gets the drift.

Here on Earth, where we all dwell for now, visionary imagination is very important, particularly if it goes against the current and opens new doors of perception. People who discard those who still dare to imagine, or ridicule them fail to understand the power of imagination when it comes to creation, and they fail to understand that the world they live in today is what it is-- good and bad--because of our collective imagination that we continuously act upon and create from. Those who put people with imagination down may do so if they in the same breath also can honestly say that the world we all live in is perfect and cannot be improved. If that is the case, all additional imagination and creation is destructive. However, I think we can all agree that this is not the case.

Throughout history, and up to present time, people have been killed for being imaginative and visionary because they shake the status quo, upon which the top layer of society feeds. Why would they want changes they cannot control? Of course, they will fight anyone and anything that shakes the status quo. But the real problem is when the population in general are supporting the idea of a status quo because they are stuck within their comfort zone--even if the comfort zone includes a lot of anxiety and uncertainties. The philosophy is, "I know what I have, but I don't know what I'll get" if changes are happening or are about to happen. People fear changes, so therefore, they are scared of visionaries--particularly if the visionaries gain ground amongst a certain number of people.

Many a wise man has said that fear is our worst enemy--particularly if the fear itself is only imaginative and nebulous. If fear is almost all we have left of our imagination, it's obvious that fear will create more fear. Can a person really create something constructive for others to enjoy if their heart and mind are full of fear? Rarely. The so-called Powers That Be know too well that we humans have a great capacity to imagine and create, and they can't stop us from doing that because it's innate. But they can redirect our imagination and our creative abilities. Thus, we have the fantastic fearmongering and threats of terror and horror in mainstream media and elsewhere in society. That creates a very fearful population, as we know.

What does this fear entail on a grander scale? If a great number of the population is struck by collective fear, we imagine the worst-case scenario and diminish ourselves, shrinking our own soul and mind, hoping we are invisible. But it is the word "imagine" that is important here. If the mass consciousness imagines the worst-case scenario, and imagination is a major part of creation, what will such collective fear bring about? Usually, it brings about the worst-case scenario. When that goal is reached, the EL-ite can then resolve the issue to their benefit, and people will calm down and even thank them. However, if we are familiar with the subconscious mind and trauma-based mind control, we also know that although a mass hysteria is normally resolved when a certain goal is met, the trauma and emotional wounds remain in the mass population. These traumas and wounds can then be triggered in the next staged event, and people will follow their fear-based patterns accordingly, as planned. Humans have over time become puppets on a string. Say boo and an entire population's heart rate increases.

This is why it is so important to learn about how this works and how it is set up. Not only should we stop falling for it, but we also need to inform people we know, and tell them how this works. Fear of ridicule and loss of human connections might hold us back from doing that, but this, too, is programmed trauma and part of our healing process, i.e., to be or become authentic and speak our minds. How else can we make a difference? If ridicule happens, it's not our problem--we are informing people, and it's up to them to process the information as they see fit.

I am of an older generation now, who, believe it or not, was alive before the Internet and personal computers. We used to be able to fantasize more and create inside our minds, but with the Internet, we seek imagination and creativity from outside and let the Internet do the imaginative part. As soon as we have a question—even of a mundane nature—we google it instead of sitting there, imagining different solutions to the problem, and solving it inside our own minds. We need imagination to problem solve! The Internet must not always be the answer to our questions. We are here to do INNER work, not let OUTER work to the INNER work for us. I am not saying we should stop using the Internet, but we need to think about, and be aware of these things, or we will get trapped in the digital world, i.e., the Singularity. Never ever let your imagination die and give it away. How can we be "creator gods" in the Universe if we have forgotten how to imagine properly?

We incrementally forget how to create something ourselves and how to get stimulation from using our own Divine Minds, which is actually filled with so much wonder. These days, we prefer to get stimulation from the Internet rather than from our own Innernet. This is dangerous for our creativity. It's okay to ask others for opinions and ask questions, but don't expect the Internet or someone else to give you all the answers. Take whatever you get from somewhere or from someone else (so-called input), process it in your own mind, and let your imagination work. THAT's how we learn. Not by being given ALL the answers. The answer we might get can be used as catalysts, so we can expand on these answers by using our own minds. After all, wasn't this what the old philosophers did? And look at them—many of us still listen to them today because they make us think for ourselves.

Connect with others and discuss and share your ideas and your imagination like the old philosophers did because we are all philosophers if we only connect with ourselves. Listen to each other and take in what is being said. Then, process it in your own mind, question it, and conclude.

This is how mankind is making progress. And if we are using the Internet, this is how it can be used constructively. We have something not even the old philosophers had—we have access to interesting people, ideas, and visions across the entire world in an instant. Take advantage of it so long as this window in time is open. Realize that you are both unique and common, like all of us. People around the world are waiting for someone to come forth—someone who is brave enough to be themselves and inspire others to be the same. Why not be one of the pioneers?
